D URING the Dec. 7 editorial, the Standard-Examiner reported on the diminishing convenience of the public phone booth. Given that the temperature was 11 degrees that morning, the city allowed some business owners to use the phone booths as warming stations, as did everyone else involved in the meeting. Despite the fact that we were in a modern, multi-million dollar building, the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.

Some of the folks involved in the meeting sat on their coats. Some placed them on the floor. Others chose to sit near the meeting during the meeting. It was not the first time I had seen public phone booths become unceremonious dumping grounds.