I visited Fermilab on June 27th, during a public tour, one week before the announcement of the discovery of the Higgs boson. This account will cover some of my experiences, including the scenic geography of the site, a bit about the mechanics of particle production and acceleration, and a light discussion of the finding of the Higgs particle, in which Fermilab played an important role.

Light refreshments will be served.