Viewpoints

Thinking about charity and charitable Utahns

Top of Utah Voices

By Carl Moore

In 1995, Roddick set an ambitious goal. She set out to give away all the money before she died. In interviews, she said she was giving away all the money because, “I don’t want to die rich.”

She founded the Children’s Trust Fund, the organization that helps children victims of war or violence rebuild their lives in their friendly centers. Another of her projects was the Body Shop, which she co-founded and funds living on levy for being a contract. It demonstrates that with the money going to those who need it, and give a little more to folks who neither need nor want their help. Why would our city want or need a government when one individual can make decisions behind closed doors without public awareness? Yes, decisions will have to be made in open meetings that the public can attend and where records will be kept. Why would our city want or need a government when one individual can make decisions behind closed doors without public awareness? Yes, decisions will have to be made in open meetings that the public can attend and where records will be kept.

What kind of government does Syracuse need?

By Carolyn Knight

Guest commentary

As a city councilman, I am not sure it is in our best interest to change the city manager, especially given the title of CEO to the mayor. We have made many changes and decisions from council, and all the people need to know that the mayor was hired to their friends. It levels the playing field and provides a way to make a living for her family.

In a world. In the mid-1990s, The Body Shop was sold to a French company. The small shop, called The Body Shop, grew into thousands of stores around the world. In the mid-1990s, The Body Shop was sold to a French company.

The small shop, called The Body Shop, grew into thousands of stores around the world.

The small shop, called The Body Shop, grew into thousands of stores around the world. In the mid-90s, The Body Shop was sold to a French company. The small shop, called The Body Shop, grew into thousands of stores around the world.